WHY SHOULD IDAHOANS PAY FOR SOMEONE ELSE’S BAD ENERGY INVESTMENT?

BE HEARD
Five years ago, Warren Buffett purchased the electric utility that serves southeast Idaho. In 2008 he signed off on a $6.1 billion investment anticipating President Obama’s Cap & Trade legislation. His plan was simple: build wind farms in Wyoming and transmit the resulting “green energy” to the states that adopted renewable energy mandates. The billions that would be spent on the infrastructure needed to transmit that power to the outlying states, including power plant upgrades and the construction of major transmission lines, was to be paid for by Californians and Oregonians through an increase in end-user energy costs. It seemed a simple, safe investment for Mr. Buffett.

Due to a staggering economy and derailed Cap & Trade legislation, overall demand for energy along the coast and, in particular, demand for “green energy” imported from other states greatly decreased. Construction of key sections of the anticipated massive transmission infrastructure stopped before ever reaching their target markets. Suddenly, Idaho, Wyoming and Utah were left with a potential “over-build” of energy infrastructure built to handle four times the energy they could conceivably use. But Mr. Buffett still hoped to make back the money he invested. So with the market changes in California and Oregon, and the failure of Cap & Trade legislation, Buffett and his managers are poised to shift the cost to Rocky Mountain rate payers through increased energy costs.

An energy infrastructure built to transmit “green energy” to other states should not be built into Idaho rates. We didn’t ask for it, we don’t need it, and we shouldn’t be expected to pay for it. Join us in telling Mr. Buffett that increasing our energy costs in current economic conditions is not an option. We urge you to attend one or both of the following public hearings on the matter so your voice can be heard.
